A completely passive M2M (Machine-to-Machine) communication system is, at present, regarded as one of the most favorable M2M communication models, due to advantages such as long-distance transmission and plentiful service resources. In this communication model, a terminal equipment in a coverage area of a base station communicates with the base station, and the base station is a base station with a coverage area coverage of the base station, which is herein referred to as a broad base station (a base station without a coverage area). In a situation of transmission in the M2M communication system, a terminal equipment in the coverage area of the base station obtains a communication channel by using resource scheduling, and performs uplink transmission according to a request sent by the base station. After the base station completes transmission, an uplink channel having the same resource is allocated to the terminal equipment, and the terminal equipment uses the uplink channel to transmit data. In such an M2M communication mode, how to control a transmission rate of a terminal equipment having no coverage area is an issue for enhancing the transmission rate of the M2M communication system. Long-term results of segmental tubular femur drilling for intramedullary nailing. A prospective study of 17 patients. The aims of the study were to evaluate complications and the functional outcome and prospectively to compare the functional results after segmental drilling of the femur with that of the regular lengthening and osteotomy of the femur. In 17 patients with transverse or short oblique femoral fractures who had undergone segmental tubular femur drilling and intramedullary nailing, an average of 12.5 months after the index operation, the outcome was evaluated. Functional outcomes were determined by the Musculoskeletal Tumor Society (MSTS) scoring system. At latest follow-up, none of the patients had died, and 10 had undergone amputation (n = 4) or died from other causes than the initial fracture (n = 6). Ten patients had died from recurrent fractures. Three patients had died from the initial fracture after
