the legal pages. Battery modules that are used for secondary batteries such as a cylindrical lithium secondary battery, a prismatic lithium secondary battery or a pouch secondary battery, and the like are configured to have a structure in which battery cells are connected with an electrode tab (a positive electrode tab and a negative electrode tab), and then a connection portion between the battery cells and the electrode tab is sealed. As one of the methods of manufacturing the battery module, there is a method in which the electrode tabs are aligned and arranged on the bottom of a molding die, and a plurality of sheet-like positive electrode plates and a plurality of sheet-like negative electrode plates are stacked on top of each other, and then a curing process is performed. As another method of manufacturing the battery module, there is a method in which after the positive electrode plates and the negative electrode plates are arranged in a direction of a stacking direction, and in a state that respective leading edges of the positive electrode plates and the negative electrode plates are aligned in a direction perpendicular to the stacking direction, a roll-based conductive film is wound, and a state that the conductive film is wound is maintained, a curing process is performed, and then a battery case is formed (for example, see Japanese Unexamined Patent Application Publication No. 2003-22717). However, in the case where the positive electrode tabs are arranged in the same direction, there is a problem in that a portion of a corresponding positive electrode tab and a corresponding negative electrode tab are overlapped. Therefore, it is difficult to form a circuit for short-circuiting between the positive electrode tab and the negative electrode tab by using a conductive film.
