Since the challenge started in January, more than 40 new teams have registered. To get started, each new developer needs to create a game using the Photon engine, which is part of the Unity software. So far, the 41 games developed for the Prey Game Development Challenge have been built using tools provided by Unity and Photon. Different rules and guidelines will be applied to the winners of the overall competition, according to the Windows Store team in charge of the Prey Challenge. In total, the Prey Game Development Challenge is expected to offer more than $140,000 in prizes. The top three winners will also get the opportunity to enter the Unity-Developed games final at the 2016 Game Connect Japan show in April.
