Biomarkers are needed to accurately determine arsenic (As) exposure and subsequent risk in human health. A panel of biomarkers was assessed for their ability to accurately predict total As (TAs), inorganic As (iAs), and dimethylarsinic acid (DMAA) in human urine. Spot urine samples were collected from 230 volunteers after either consuming seafood contaminated with As or smoking tobacco. Based on the biomarkers observed, the best predictors for each variable were identified as urinary Cd ($r = 0.58$), urinary N-methyl-N-guanidinoacetate ($r = 0.48$), and 570a42141b
