The exhibit included a lot of wonderful art by people such as: -- Robert Indiana -- -- Sol LeWitt -- -- Saul Steinberg -- and others. What caught my attention was the work by Robert Indiana. I purchased a book called "Lonely in America" which is a collection of his drawings. I found them to be just as fascinating as the work in the exhibit. I've read that many of the artists in the exhibit were unhappy with how much people appreciate their work. I'd say that we "appreciate" the work of these and other great artists too much for their liking. If people paid a little more for the work, these artists wouldn't have to sell their collections for a pittance. Read these statements from Robert Indiana:"There is nothing there. I only use ordinary household materials, such as scissors, glue, stamps, glue stick, etc. - do you see any difference?... It is silly to claim that you understand something if you understand nothing of it, that you can give an opinion. To say 'this is beautiful' - you have to have something of it, otherwise you are simply making an idle comment.... The 'karma' of a sculpture is decided when I made it, not at some time in the future. Art is not a result, but a progression. To see a good result is a privilege, but it is a closed-minded person who will miss the significance of the journey. I
