Inhibition of lupus-like autoimmunity in IL-6-receptor deficient MRL mice with loss of an intermediate T cell subset. IL-6 is a critical proinflammatory cytokine that can be upregulated in inflammation and has been implicated in the pathogenesis of several autoimmune diseases. IL-6 signaling through the soluble and membrane-bound IL-6 receptor (IL-6R) results in the activation of JAK/STAT3, MAPK, and NF- $\kappa$ B signaling pathways. The development of hematopoietic cells may be regulated by the availability of positive and negative hematopoietic cytokines. The immunostimulatory effects of IL-6 may be enhanced by its association with membrane-bound IL-6R. This suggests that the membrane form of the IL-6R may be important for regulating autoimmunity. To test this, we compared IL-6R deficient MRL/Lpr mice that develop a lupus-like disease
