Professional Servers are the backbone of your gaming experience. Here are a few things to look for when shopping for a new game server Physical hardware If you're a gamer at heart, you want to have a solid gaming PC that has enough oomph to keep up with modern games. In particular, your motherboard and processor should both be solid. Of course, you also need to ensure that it's something you're willing to upgrade in the future, but that's a topic for another post. Storage Next up, you want a large, fast drive to store your data, and the fastest one you can afford. You want to choose a drive with at least 80GB of space. That's not only a nice number for the number of files you'll be handling, it's also enough for a lot of big games. You might want to max out your storage though if you're running multiple clients at once or on high-demand games, but that's just my recommendation. If you're not having a lot of trouble with your storage space, consider adding more to your system. CPU, RAM, and GPU These are all pretty important components of your gaming experience. The CPU is what your computer does while it's running. In particular, you want to make sure it has enough grunt to handle the requirements of your current system and game. You'll also want it to be able to handle the number of games you'll be playing at once. RAM is a part of your computer's memory. Each game needs to be assigned its own space to run within. Graphic cards have their own data storage, which means you'll want to pick a card with a lot of capacity. A motherboard It might seem strange to mention this in

One problem I have run into is that when the user resizes the window of the app, it isn't firing the resize event when `resize="both"` is specified in the application's runtime-descriptor, and my functionality is meant to be triggered on this event. It works fine in all other browsers, but IE11 is the only one that seems to have this issue. I've been going through all my code and every place I can think of that an event could be getting fired is null and never getting an event back from the stage. I've also tried manually setting the resized width and height values to values that I know should have triggered it, and that doesn't seem to do anything. The parent application is a Silverlight app that I've modified to include the event listener for the resize event in the HTML, and is also a full-screen app. I have set the stage to be fullscreen in the application, so I was under the impression that this would also prevent the stage from resizing. I'm hoping that this is a known issue with IE11 and that there is a workaround, or that someone has some insight into what I'm doing wrong. A: Ok, so I've figured out what the issue was. I was referencing the application's runtime-descriptor from the Silverlight application's code (calling some stuff from Silverlight into AIR, for the lack of a better term). This was working fine in IE11, but I then referenced a different runtime-descriptor in a place that wasn't referenced in the Silverlight app's runtime-descriptor and then references to that one started causing other things in the Silverlight app to behave weird. I changed the references back and things started working again. Sorry for the noob question, and thank you to everyone who took the time to answer. Ed.
