Chang liver cells, and some other mammalian cells, depend on the presence of extracellular glycine for their viability. These cells have the capacity to synthesize glycine from serine. In order to investigate the possibility that the glycine concentration in hypothalamic terminals is controlled by glycine transport into the cells, we investigated the mRNA levels of the two known glycine transporter subtypes (GlyT1 and GlyT2) and the intracellular glycine concentration. The presence of GlyT2-mRNA was demonstrated by Northern analysis and in situ hybridization, showing cells in the arcuate nucleus (neurons), median preoptic nucleus and ventromedial hypothalamus (perikarya). GlyT1-mRNA was localized in the perikarya of the ventromedial hypothalamus. Glycine concentration was determined in the perikarya and terminals of the ventromedial hypothalamus using HPLC with on-line electrochemical detection. The concentration of glycine was in the range 20-40 micromol/l, and was on average 30 micromol/l. This is much higher than the physiological level of 2.5 micromol/l or lower, and it is in the
