Regulation of iron metabolism and signaling in HIV-induced pathogenesis: implications in therapy and prevention. Iron metabolism plays a critical role in the pathogenesis of the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) disease. Iron, acting as an essential constituent of essential enzymes and regulatory proteins, is necessary for viral replication. Defective iron metabolism leads to a vicious cycle with increased iron supply, viral replication and subsequent increased iron levels, which enhances cellular replication and the destruction of the immune esis. Hetero-oligodendrocytes provide the neuregulin receptors in the oligodendrocyte lineage. Efficient transduction of oligodendrocytes requires the presence of hetero-oligodendrocytes (HOs). We have investigated the hetero-oligodendrocyte derivation from the neuroectoderm of C57BL/6 mice and compared it with the generation of Olig2-positive cells in neural crest-derived cultures. We report here that most HOs are derived from the neuroectoderm by a process that depends on basic fibroblast growth factor (bFGF) and is independent of Olig2. Using bFGF signaling inhibitor SU5402, we found that the self-renewing potential of neuroectoderm-derived cells required endogenous autocrine bFGF. In contrast, neural crest-derived cells do not survive on the inhibitor, suggesting that non-self-renewing progenitors (or fate-restricted progenitors) are required to generate HO cells. Furthermore, the comparison of neuroectoderm-derived cells and Olig2-positive neural crest-derived cells revealed a striking difference: the appearance of HO progenitors after the elimination of Olig2-positive cells in the neural tube. Our data indicate that HO generation in the
