Kimi Raikkonen may be the most versatile driver on the grid, but it's his team-mate Sebastian Vettel who holds the key to Ferrari's destiny this season. After a thunderous victory at the Sochi Autodrom in Russia last time out, Vettel has set the pace in the opening three races this season and set out on his mission to bring the Scuderia its first race triumph since 2005. The German has been the quicker of the two for the opening two races and has looked quick from the off. Any slip-ups in the first stint of either race has cost him dearly, and given the blundering of his team-mate, he has kept the grid spot as the consequence. In its glory days, Ferrari relied on a talented middle-order through Sebass and yet those days are long gone and now it's down to Vettel and Raikkonen to push the boat out and raise the bar. With 14 victories to his name, Vettel knows that he is on the right track, but he knows the same hasn't been said of his team-mate who is largely the man to save Ferrari. "We can always improve," admitted the German after his win in Sochi. "If we had a perfect race today, we could have improved the car a little bit more. "So we have to keep pushing but we are much further ahead than we have been at the start of the season. We have shown we can race at the front and to continue like this is the target." Vettel had a flawless start to his debut season in Formula One in Australia, and has shown the same flair in the opening part of the campaign. However, he admitted Ferrari's car could be better with its power unit, but he reckoned it would be difficult to better Red Bull this season, in what is turning into the three horse race in Formula One. "Still very happy with the car and the team and of course there's room for improvement," admitted Vettel. "The RB12 had been really good in Australia. "We improved from the previous race but still room for improvement so it's an ongoing process. "We need to try to improve and not only this season. We need to improve as a team, otherwise that's it and 6a5afdab4c
