This study uses econometric methods to assess the impact of housing policies on housing-unmet need in the context of housing reform in China. The results indicate that after reforms, China's housing-unmet need has fallen but not significantly. Two policies can contribute to this result: the enforcement of rent controls in selected cities and the removal of fees on mortgages. Compared to the period before reforms, urban household debt rose by only one-fifth. The declining housing-unmet need is due in part to the increase in average urban household income, which accounts for about half of the rise in housing-unmet need. Longyan Zhou This paper explores how China's housing reforms have changed the relationship between residential space, local land use, and income. First, local land use led to new housing supply in China, rather than being a limiting factor. Second, regional policy and local land-use policy lead to asymmetric growth patterns of new housing supply and local land use. Compared to the 1990s and 2000s, the effect of these two factors 1d6a3396d6

Q: Is this a valid proof to show $1=0$? Using $S1$ and $S0$ as the two constants in the \mathbb{Z} field, I proved that $1=0$. $S1=0 \cdot \underbrace{1+1+\dots+1}_{\{\text{natural numbers}\}} \cdot \underbrace{0+0+\dots+0}_{\{\text{natural numbers}\}}=0$ My textbook says that we should not use an arbitrary number to represent a number, because that would break the laws of algebra. So how did I get $1=0$? What does \mathbb{Z} field imply? Are there any more proofs of $1=0$? A: You cannot prove the equality of two expressions by reducing them into a single expression (or, at least, one
