In my country, when I was in high school, my teacher(physics) would say: "you need to do high school to do college". You could try your best in high school, and you would be "college ready", but you won't be certain if you would pass or not. I'm asking now about this sentence "[...] you need to take courses as 'experience of high school' to be 'college ready'". what is "level"? is "level" = "level of education"? A: We might call this a 'level of education'. But in the context that you presented, the higher educational institution is a school, and perhaps the subject being discussed is the need to prepare for college. 'Course' is a term with many different meanings that depend on the context, as you saw when your physics teacher used it. It might refer to an academic subject, like a physics course at a university, or it might refer to a piece of academic work, like a first year university course, but it can also refer to a course on a particular thing, such as a pilot training course, or a particular course in biology or on a particular computer program. We can be a bit more precise about the use of the word course in education. In general, when someone does a course in something, they are doing a guided study of a particular subject or field, and they might find it useful to read other material on the subject, but there is no clear distinction between the topic covered by the course and the topics covered by other forms of study. I don't know exactly what your physics teacher means, but if he is teaching a physics course, and he is giving a briefing on what to expect when you start college, then he is probably using course in a more restricted way. For example, if he were teaching a freshman physics course, he might provide a link to a list of recommended reading and say that people must read some of that material before taking the course.
