Other software Notes Category:Removable computer storage devicesThe present invention relates to a carbon-encapsulated metal-wire composite electrode having a corrosion-resistant surface layer. More particularly, the present invention relates to a carbon-encapsulated metal-wire composite electrode in which the surface layer that adheres to the carbon-encapsulated metal-wire composite electrode is made from an electrically conductive material, such as graphite, and a method of preparing the same. As a consequence of recent efforts made toward the development of secondary batteries having a high capacity, there has been an increasing demand for a high-capacity metal-wire composite electrode. A metal-wire composite electrode is usually formed by encapsulating a metal-wire in an electrically conductive material, such as a plastic material and then impregnating the encapsulated metal-wire with a solution of an active material, thereby providing a high-capacity and high-output secondary battery. However, such metal-wire composite electrodes generally have a low capacity and low output. Various methods have been proposed for solving this problem. For example, Japanese Unexamined Patent Publication No. 5-43166 discloses a method for increasing the capacity and output of a metal-wire composite electrode by increasing the surface area of the metal-wire encapsulated in a body of a conductive material, including sintering. However, sintering is disadvantageous in that it requires a heat treatment at a high temperature in the range of 500.degree. to 1,500.degree. C. This heat treatment generally results in an increase in the cost and in the volume of the body of a conductive material used to encapsulate the metal-wire. In addition, using a conductive material to encapsulate a metal-wire makes the metal-wire susceptible to corrosion by the conductive material.Richard A.
