In order to study the endometrial and placental expression of estrogen and progesterone receptors in human pregnancy, endometrial and placental tissues from 35 pregnant women were studied by means of immunohistochemical techniques. In the endometrium of normal pregnancy the estrogen and progesterone receptors were expressed in glandular and stromal cells in the proliferative phase. The expression of these receptors was observed in the endometrium during pregnancy, regardless of the parity. However, the progesterone receptor levels were higher in the first pregnancy than in the second and third. In the placenta, high levels of estrogen receptor were observed during normal pregnancy, while the progesterone receptor was absent. In pregnancies complicated by intrauterine growth retardation the progesterone receptor expression in the endometrium was similar to that observed in normal pregnancy. The expression of estrogen receptor was lower, and the progesterone receptor expression was higher than in normal pregnancy. These results suggest that the progesterone receptor may have a role in the development of placenta during normal pregnancy, while the progesterone receptor in the endometrium during pregnancy may participate in the uterine contractile process. The lack of progesterone receptors in the placenta in pregnancies complicated by intrauterine growth retardation suggests a possible etiological role for this hormonal regulator of pregnancy.Q: How to attach a movie to message using iOS Messages App?
