It's well known fact that more than 90% of traders lose money in the share market and after more than a decade I found it was because they haven't a clue about correct Money Risk Management, so doesn't it make sense to do the opposite of what most people are doing? Too many people have trouble selling when in a losing position and become Long Term Investors to justify them holding onto that share. It's too hard for them to admit they've made a mistake. Some of the best Traders in the World only get about 50% of their trades right, only make money 50% of the time. The reason why successful stock market traders trading shares ARE so profitable is because they are disciplined and follow proven Money Risk Management strategies. They exit at the first opportunity after the evidence indicates the share market has turned against them and when in profit let the share market signal when to get out and not their friends or emotions. After buying that share always assume you've made a mistake because the chances are you probably have! It'll be easier to close that losing trade if you were expecting it. Always PLAN for the BEST but be ready for the WORST. It's too hard for them to admit they've made a mistake.
