The popularity of commodity pooling has exploded in recent years due to the fact that it provides an efficient and transparent method of pooling resources in the commodity markets and investing in an index of commodities or a sub-index of a commodity index. With commodity pooling, potential returns are generated on an even basis, thereby helping to equalize the risk distribution in a commodity market. Commodity pools are now an established and popular market form for trading in the commodity markets. Some commodity pools have a pooling structure that is comprised of a hedging function in which participants invest in a pool to gain profits from the pool's exposure to the commodity price. In order to minimize risk, hedging pools are typically comprised of open-ended contracts with participants having the option to withdraw their investments at will. Commodity pools benefit from pooling certain expenses. For example, pooling research costs makes the individual participants more efficient in terms of cost efficiency and liquidity. Pooling other operational costs of trading a commodity makes the individual participants more efficient in terms of service efficiency. For example, pooling clearing and settlement costs for a pool member removes one layer of administrative costs, thereby increasing the processing speed of the pool and reducing the work load of the pool administrator. However, pooling certain expenses creates certain problems. For example, pooling research costs creates a situation in which a pool member has to choose between not participating in the pool and risking high research costs and the possibility of a poor investment. Therefore, a need exists in the art to provide an improved method for a commodity pool wherein a pool member is provided the option of withdrawing their commodity position.
