Second, this study cannot explore the unique characteristics in internalizing symptoms of Chinese Americans, and our data does not allow us to rule out the possibility that there are other additional, unmeasured confounding factors. Third, the participants in our study were not assessed for comorbid disorders before or after the death of their spouses, which may increase some estimation bias (eg, recall bias). Fourth, our data are not longitudinal, which prevents us from exploring the change in suicidal ideation over time. Finally, our data were collected in one group of Chinese Americans in a time period that included a nuclear war in China, and therefore, our findings may not generalize to other samples. Further replication in other samples and in other cultures is warranted. The clinical implications of this study are that it extends the findings about the associations between the burden of caregiving and depressive symptoms (eg, negative appraisal and distress) to a new population that seldom receives empirical attention. This study suggests that Chinese Americans, who may be especially burdened by the caregiving demands after the death of their spouses, should be systematically screened and supported. Clinicians and the health services should extend their routine screening practice to include the bereavement period for Chinese American elders and provide adequate, culturally relevant supportive services to survivors of completed suicides. The authors thank Yuan Tian, Zhen Zhao, and Hongyun Zeng for their contribution to data collection.
