The current-mirror therefore need not be permanently switched-on in this case, as the base currents are rapidly changed. This is a further refinement in the sense of quiet operation of the circuit, as continuous operation with the current-mirror switched on is not required. A further refinement in the sense of a low-radiation current-mirror circuit having a low susceptibility to radiation is achieved in accordance with the invention, as the current-mirror field remains essentially in the desired state. In this case, it is particularly expedient if the voltage-mirror field is on the slow side, as the voltage is altered only very slowly, so that charge carriers can be transported in the reversal-field region with the current-mirror field switched on, before changing direction. This is advantageous as long as the current-mirror is switched-on, but advantageous in the reverse direction, too, as it is the voltage-mirror field which has to be reset, so that the charge carriers are removed. In one development, the one of the transistors in the current-mirror circuit has its collector connected to the output terminal. In
