An autofocus camera is a camera that automatically focuses on the subject. This feature can be turned on and off in your camera menu. This option is most useful when using a camera for pictures of children or pets. An autofocus feature allows you to take pictures with much less adjusting. For this reason, it is important to ensure that you choose a camera with autofocus if you are concerned about being able to quickly capture special moments with your children. Following are the basic tools available in the menu on your camera. Mode: Choose this menu setting depending on what you are doing. If you are just looking through the camera's viewfinder, the function of this menu setting will determine whether you choose optical zoom (zoom to a specific focal length and then enlarge the picture) or digital zoom (zoom in by cropping the picture from the top and bottom of the frame). If your camera has a live view display, you can select the size of the image you want by adjusting your digital zoom. When you are reviewing your photo on the camera monitor, you can adjust the zoom or make other camera adjustments by pushing the button on the lens. When you first start using a new camera, there is a set of default options that will be chosen for you. As your familiarity with the camera grows, you can learn to make adjustments yourself. This is especially important if you are following a written tutorial. Picture Styles: This is the most visible option on the camera; it gives you the ability to have your pictures look like other images that you might have taken. Figure 9-2: Choose Picture Styles to affect the look of your pictures. | --- | --- If you don't have any specific instructions on how to apply a particular Picture Style, consider using _Highlights & Shadows,_ which is the style that will look the most like those pictures you see from your friends on Facebook. For even more possibilities, you can experiment with the other three types of Picture Styles, shown in Figure 9-2: Pictures: This picture mode is also known as _Picture Control._ This option is the default setting and offers a lot of control over your pictures. Portrait: This option offers a similar control to the Standard Picture Styles. However, Portrait offers a specific look focused on people. Landscape: This style's

The struggle for acceptance and integration is equally difficult for many in today's migrant communities, and to make matters worse, mainstream media are reporting that the 'immigrant crime wave' is on the rise. The BBC reports that the "immigrant crime wave" has been wrongly claimed by white Britons and police after Mamphela Ramphele, a renowned anti-racism activist, was unfairly labeled a "racist" for opposing a series of deadly attacks in South Africa. When Ramphele stood in the London 2015 general election, some right-wing politicians and media commentators used the label to delegitimize her policies by arguing that they would increase crime, especially in areas with large immigrant populations. But the UK's Home Office received intelligence from a variety of sources, including security services, that it could not corroborate this claim. The report makes it clear that immigrants are not only in the UK to engage in crime. Most immigrants are decent and hard-working people. The phenomenon of children and families from Africa and Asia migrating to Europe is largely a factor of poverty and of the fact that Europe is the closest region to sub-Saharan Africa, which has a huge population. Europe's land borders with Africa are relatively closed and that has made it easier for African children and young adults to reach Europe. According to the report, the percentage of immigrants being convicted of a crime is no higher than among other Britons. There is no suggestion that these statistics are inaccurate or that non-immigrants commit a lower crime rate than immigrants. It would also be unwise to

The FBI, as well as the consumer advocacy groups, have said that the power of "camel" search engines-- like Bing, Yahoo, and Google-- in finding child pornography is unacceptably high. In a post explaining the search engine limitation, FBI spokeswoman Deborah Madden said that in many cases, children who are the victims of these crimes have no way of reporting the crimes, let alone getting their images removed from the Internet, because all links to the images are indexed by search engines. Madden wrote: "If a search engine, including Yahoo and Bing, does not remove images of suspected child pornography from its search results, it is similar to having an open door and no police in the hallway. It is difficult to determine if the police have reason to check in that hallway." On Monday, World Privacy Forum and SafeCom, two of the consumer advocacy groups leading the charge to eliminate these issues, announced that Internet service providers have begun to launch new efforts to alert users when their Internet service is being monitored. A new service called Internet Activity Detection launched by Internet Service Providers (ISPs) on Monday can detect when a user is connecting to an outside computer or accessing networked resources. The problem with searching for these child pornography images, the groups say, is that no one can see who is looking up these images. So, on the off chance someone is looking for these horrific images, the ISP can't be sure if it is a man of the world looking for the sickest of "curiosity," or the victim of a crime who is trying to erase the evidence. In fact, in a recent case, the FBI says that a Louisiana man downloaded more than 100 images of children under the age of 12 being raped on websites located in America and Russia, but he did not realize he was downloading them until his ISPs began flagging the images. The groups say the service also will include an easier way for consumers to report activity without having to call the ISP themselves, and the service is being tested by ISPs like AT&T, Sprint and T-Mobile.It's not clear what the proposed 'guarantee' would be, but the idea of a basic income is gathering support in a number of places. An online poll conducted in Britain by the think tank, Citizens' Income Trust, also found that 81 per cent of respondents supported the idea, although the poll had only 800 participants. The idea of
