Bookshop.The present invention relates to polymeric materials that are useful as components of battery electrodes. More particularly, the invention relates to polymeric binders of perfluoro carbonate polymer materials useful in lithium battery electrodes. Lithium batteries are the primary source of electrical energy for portable electronic equipment such as notebook and laptop computers. Miniature lithium ion batteries are currently in widespread use in portable electronic devices and have been known to provide a very high energy density. Their reliance on moisture and/or air for their maintenance of their energy storage capabilities over time, however, makes them unsuitable for use in many demanding environments, such as a space station. One possible solution to the problem is to provide a lithium battery that is sealed so that its components, such as the cathode/separator/anode materials, are substantially free from the ambient atmosphere. The cathode material is typically comprised of a lithium compound, a chalcogen and a polymeric binder. The chalcogen is typically lithium or another alkali metal, an alloy of lithium and another alkali metal or a transition metal element. The polymeric binder is typically a fluorinated carbonate polymer. The binder is a non-functional polymer which, upon curing, is the material which holds the other components of the cathode together in the composite. For example, the binder is often a fluorinated polyvinylidene fluoride (PVDF), a fluorinated ethylene propylene (FEP) or
