Note You can download tutorials on the web for pretty much every imaginable topic. Just search for "Photoshop elements" or "photoshop" and you'll find many helpful tutorials from beginner to expert. # Using a Digital Camera or Scanner Photoshop Elements works with many different cameras, but it's more common to use a digital camera that's connected to a computer. For many of us, the most common digital camera is built into a handheld digital camera. There are plenty of digital cameras on the market, but most provide _raw image data_ as soon as you press the button. Raw data, or _uncompressed_data_, doesn't yet contain _edits_ or modifications, to fix image flaws (such as missing color, dull edges, red-eye, and other issues). Raw images need editing or they won't look right when they are combined with other photos in a project. Editing with Photoshop Elements includes creating custom _color_ and _grayscale_ maps (which are discussed in step 4, on Normalizing Photos).

Lately, I find myself thinking about how nice it would be to be able to take a photo of anything I see on the street without having to worry about whether it's "interesting" enough to be posted to Instagram. A few days ago, I was standing in line at the grocery store when I spotted a guy holding a big sheet of paper that looked suspiciously like a map of where the really good movies were showing in town that week. I was very tempted to snap a photo of the paper. But as I stood there, wondering whether or not I'd be a total perv for taking a picture of the dude's map, I thought about how, just that day, I'd already taken a photo of some guy who worked in an office and wanted to feed his family. I wondered whether I'd be a jerk if I whipped out my camera and took some pictures of a person—a person who was trying to feed his family, but had a hard time doing so—and posted the photos on social media. On one hand, I suppose that what most people do when they read a book is get the book in their hands, read the pages, and then throw it aside. Sure, some people will continue to read book after book, but I'm not sure if that counts as "reading" in the same way that someone who plays a smartphone game while sitting in their car counts as "driving." Because, like playing a smartphone game while driving, there's a ton of other stuff happening at the same time—namely, someone else driving while using their smartphone. Do you think people do that when they read a book? Do you think that when they throw a book away they're taking that book out of the world? Do you think that what they're taking out of the world with the book is just the book itself? Can you go home with all of the stuff that you read? Should you be able to do that? In the case of a person who plays a smartphone game while sitting in their car, I don't think that there's any question that they're taking stuff out of the world. If you drive around town every day, you're going to see cars, busses, buildings, and lots of other stuff. But with any of those other things, you're seeing just

What's New in the Photoshop CC 2015?

Citizens group wants to ban private marijuana sales Roughly 8,000 Colorado residents who suffer from chronic conditions are now registered with a federally approved doctor who can recommend them medical marijuana. Photo by David Zalubowski/AP. Stem. Americans for Safe Access, a national advocacy group for medical marijuana patients, is now petitioning the federal government to ban all private drug sales. Americans for Safe Access (ASA), which currently works to protect medical marijuana access for patients in 23 states, has already submitted nearly 100,000 signatures from Colorado and California to the federal Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA), the State Department of Justice and the Department of Health and Human Services. If the petitioners gather the necessary signatures, the federal government would have 60 days to respond to their petition. If the DEA or State Department of Justice does not take action, the petitioners would have 30 days to respond to the petition. "We're very hopeful," said ASA Executive Director Steph Sherer. "The government may decide to act right away. But there's a chance they won't." The DEA already granted state-authorized doctors the ability to issue medical marijuana recommendations on an emergency basis on July 23, 2011. But individuals can now buy medical marijuana in 34 states, 11 of which are in the Northeast, the Midwest and the West. Colorado and California are the only two states with legalized recreational marijuana. Colorado's medical marijuana law allows people with one of 26 specified health conditions to purchase a limited supply of marijuana from state-licensed stores. Each individual with a state-approved diagnosis is allowed to grow a maximum of six plants. But a marijuana patient who grows more than the minimum amount of plant material would be required to pay a $100 registration fee and be subject to extensive inspections of the marijuana plants to ensure they are free of mold, pests and disease. Colorado's law is considered fairly lenient compared to California, which does not have a state-licensed medical marijuana program. The California Bureau of Cannabis Control recently advised its license holders not to grow any marijuana plants from a rented or leased property, because of the possibility that the property owner would use the plants for recreational purposes. Sherer and other ASA advocates believe that individual Colorado medical marijuana card holders should be allowed to purchase marijuana for personal use, just as alcohol and tobacco are sold in retail stores.
