The EA SPORTS FIFA Team is honored to unveil the next evolution in sports gaming with our newest innovation, "HyperMotion Technology.” The center of our soccer engine, “HyperMotion Technology” enables first-person gameplay to more accurately simulate the characteristics and features of the sport, including tackling. We’ve worked closely with FIFA 20 real-life players, and invited them to participate in a simulation to help us fully uncover this technology. To accomplish this, we performed a complete match, starting with pickup from the training pitch, through to final whistle and watching all 22 players in motion capture suits. This gameplay was used to power the physics engine and AI with real player data, improving player control and game flow. Our real-life gamers are incredible athletes that compete on the highest levels of their sport. We challenged them to a complete football match, and watched their performance in the motion capture suits. These are the 22 real-life players that helped to build the foundation of the innovation, and we want them to share this experience with the world. During the match, the data captured from 22 real-life players provided feedback for the design team. Players were able to provide direct insight on the current state of the simulation, their own individual performance, and how they feel the game was progressing. These playbacks resulted in player input that we then incorporated into FIFA 22 to improve movement and handling, and enable high-end interactions between players. The first step in this journey was to build a simulation model, and the result was an engine that correctly modeled the characteristics of the sport, and, most importantly, the movements of the real-life players. The initial success of the simulation we built provided a blueprint for future iterations. As the data was being processed, we were able to further tune the simulation to more accurately represent the sport. The data captured from the player is extremely detailed. Not only do we have to store the information for each player, but for each player and the ball, we also record the individual impact of every collision with the player and the ball. It is during the fight to get back on the ball, when defensive players are challenged in the “50-50” position, that the collision data really makes a difference. In the past, player movements were dependent on a simple one-to-one translation to the ball or player. When this data is combined with an improved skeleton model, it allows for player
