Photoshop is available for Microsoft Windows, Mac OS X, and Linux. How Photoshop Works You can find out a lot about how Photoshop works by using a few simple examples. Let's start with a picture of a blocky pile of wood that I created and saved as a JPEG file. After that, I opened the file in Photoshop and started to manipulate it. I took the original source photo and placed it on a new layer and called it `wood.jpg`. It's a jagged, blocky pile of wood, with cracks here and there. In the process, I had to change the "blending mode," which determines the relationship between a foreground object and a background object. To my surprise, I discovered that Photoshop has a variety of blending modes, including several types of linear and radial gradients that can be applied to the wood. Photoshop has several types of layers. By default, the `wood.jpg` layer is the foreground layer. It's behind all of the other layers. To your eye, the other layers don't exist. They're hidden layers and don't affect the appearance of the picture. However, they're still there; they're just hiding. You can see how layers behave in Photoshop at any time by using the Back and Front buttons at the bottom of the Layers panel. Press Back and press Front to toggle layers on and off. I applied an assortment of layers, colors, and effects to the `wood.jpg` layer and then saved the file. I could have done much more work on it, adding in new layers to the layer stack, changing the colors, and so on. However, I wanted to demonstrate the basic layer creation process in Photoshop. In Photoshop, you can also add multiple layers within a single document (although you must use layers to do this). I placed a new layer over the `wood.jpg` layer that I named `wood_new.jpg`. I then created a new document with the new `wood_new.jpg` layer and filled it with yellow. I duplicated the `wood_new.jpg` layer and positioned it over the yellow layer. Photoshop lets you see all the layers in a layer stack at the same time, but it doesn't apply the different layer styles and effects to each of them. How the Layers Panel Works You access layers, handles, and masking by using the Layers panel. Each layer has its own panel, and

92 Ga. App. 692 (1955) 87 S.E.2d 828 ROWE v. BOARD OF REGENTS FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION. 35827. Court of Appeals of Georgia. Decided October 6, 1955. *694 Hardin & Smith, for plaintiff in error. Carl K. Butler, contra. GARDNER, P. J. 1. That portion of the contract of employment here complained of is as follows: "The employee will promptly perform his duties to the best of his ability and will be prompt and efficient in every duty entrusted to his care." This provision is, in our opinion, one of "general employment," as are numerous other employment provisions that this court, in this and other cases, has held to be subject to the limitation contained in Code (Ann. Supp.) § 105-104, and that the State Personnel Board did not have jurisdiction over such contract provisions. The provision to which objection is made (f) provides, among other things, that "The employee shall maintain an up-to-date driver's license which shall be kept in his immediate possession at all times during his employment with the University, which license shall not be more than one year old and be valid for at least a period of two years." The position of the contract with which we are here concerned is that the contract period will expire in *695 August, 1955, and that the employee will cease to work for the State of Georgia until some time in August, 1955. It is to be noted that the contract specifically provides that the employee shall not be engaged in any other employment, as stated in paragraph (b). The State Personnel Board, by regulation, under the authority granted to it by the Statute (Code Ann. § 40-2201, as amended through Acts 1952, pp. 705, 706), "has authority to require that the license of an employee shall be kept current at all times and that any employee whose license is not in good standing will not be permitted to wear the uniform and perform any of the duties of his position." The defendant, under the provisions of this regulation, had a right to require the plaintiff to have a license, which he did not have. It further appears from the record that the employee does not drive a motor vehicle for his livelihood but that he drives it in going to and from school in connection with his employment, the State of Georgia not having an
