The coalition -- an amalgam of giant tech companies, consumer groups and civil liberties groups -- laid out the proposal in a blog post that says the idea is to produce a set of specifications that need approval before getting put in place. The five-point plan calls for the creation of a portal that would allow more transparency, and for companies to be required to collect, store and share data relating to their users (a more transparent system would require the companies to go to a central portal to check if the data is being shared). Companies would also be required to make a reasonable effort to notify users when the information they share is used. The group said that ideally the section 215 data would be collected in real-time, and that it should include bulk data collection (i.e. not a database of each individual user and their activities). The effort will also focus on building a surveillance system that doesn't collect real-time information, instead focusing on early warning and something akin to profiling. The tech companies said that they would not oppose orders on specific telephone or Internet companies (the providers would have to be included if there is such an order) but would oppose orders to become a spymaster-in-chief. They also said that they would not seek to challenge orders related to a terrorism investigation. The tech companies are also calling for Section 215 to be amended to remove the language that allows for government collection of data with a "significant link" to international terrorism. Such language was used to justify the PRISM program under President Obama (who approved the program, but only after the public became aware of it). All of the companies support the current regime of checks and balances, but say it is outdated and needs change. "The Congress should act expeditiously to establish a new, modern, and limited surveillance authority with new requirements for both the contents and the use of data, and it should amend Section 215 to
