In the present work, the utilization of municipal solid waste (MSW) in the fabrication of electrodes for a Li-ion battery, and a microwave-assisted hydrothermal reaction for sodium-ion battery was investigated. The effects of different MSW on the electrochemical performances of Li-ion battery, Na-ion battery and microwave-assisted hydrothermal reaction were studied. In the cathode of lithium-ion battery, MSW can effectively decrease the charge transfer resistances of the cathode. In the anode of sodium-ion battery, MSW can obviously increase the diffusion resistance. In the microwave-assisted hydrothermal reaction, the conversion rate of NaCl can reach as high as 90% with the MSW as the raw material. The feasibility of utilizing MSW as feedstocks for energy storage is shown.Dozens of people in Berkeley, California, went to jail Tuesday night for protesting outside an event with noted white supremacist Richard Spencer. The protest focused on Spencer's appearance on public university land, the second time his planned campus event has been canceled after protests. The university told the New York Times that it has concluded Spencer does not represent the views of the University of California. "If they want to have somebody with racist, homophobic views, that's their right," Berkeley resident Bret McGonigal said, "but they have no right to publicly protest someone with racist views on university land." The protesters chanted slogans, including "No-Bama, go home!" and "The truth shall set you free!" The rally involved people from different political groups and was largely peaceful, aside from a few "distracting incidents," university spokesman Dan Mogulof told the New York Times. Police said 60 people were arrested, according to the Times. "It's a part of who we are," Spencer told reporters in Berkeley. "We're here to uphold free speech." UC Berkeley spokesperson Dan Mogulof was present at the protest but had nothing to say after witnessing the demonstration. His invite to speak at the campus was canceled last month after Unformatted text preview: to this end, we describe in this course a priori model-based inference on the underlying distributions of the demand, number of of heterogeneous items, and quality levels. A unique feature of this course is its emphasis on Bayesian methods, which is emphasized in the first four chapters, and the second two chapters on deterministic models. During the first course, we describe implicit methods, which includes Monte Carlo sampling to get exact Bayesian inferences. In the first three chapters, we get a good starting point for Bayesian inference by assuming that the model space is small and that we have sufficient information to choose the most likely model. In the second three chapters, we get a better starting point by assuming that the model space is larger than in the previous chapter, but still small enough that we have sufficient information to choose the model that best describes our data. In doing this, we use Monte Carlo sampling in the first three chapters, and the Gibbs sampler in the second three chapters. Most of the lecture notes consist of an extensive discussion of the necessary mathematical background (the basics of probability theory) and a collection of exercises and solutions. Rather than giving a lecture in the order we list the content, I will talk about the content in the order it is explained. I will mix in some mathematical details where I think they are needed to explain the concepts. I hope that we are able to discuss and understand these topics by looking at the exercises and solutions. Remember, these are lecture notes, not a complete course. I encourage you to read everything carefully and to try the exercises and solutions. I welcome all questions and feedback. Michael J.
