Google's Nexus 7 tablet is a contender in the modern all-screen 7-inch tablet market, but the company's strategy is a bit different than, say, Apple's iPad. It's not rushing ahead with a huge ecosystem of apps from day one, nor is it trying to lock its consumer customers into Google's ecosystem and services. Instead, Google has a little more of a scavenger hunt mentality with its Nexus 7. The screen shows ads when it's powered on and on as well as when it's powered off. Google didn't have any standalone ads for each purchase, so if you purchase a single app, you can see the ads that come with that app. The ads tell the users that "Google Play customers can [app name]" (Xbox, or Beats, or whatever) and they don't pay for those apps. It's very easy to tell whether you're getting paid ads or free ones, but Google told us that the ads are meant to be confusing. "The branding is confusing to make sure that it's super easy for users to understand what's going on," Google told Ars. "It's really important that people get the right experience and that they understand what's happening." Google would like your web browser window to be open, and the ads are placed in the same window, along with the Google Search bar and the Chrome address bar. When the tablet is powered off, no search or ads are displayed. You can change your search settings to "off" to disable that behavior as well. Google is still refining its policies on when it'll allow apps to show mobile-style ads on their tablets, but it says that all of the apps that you buy via Google Play will have ads. Developers can choose to have ads or not for
