As memory device sizes shrink to increase the density of memory devices, conventional lithography techniques are not suitable for manufacturing memory devices. More specifically, as the sizes of memory devices decrease, the sizes of features that are formed on memory devices (e.g., lines and spaces) are decreased. Accordingly, it is becoming increasingly difficult to control critical dimensions (CDs) of the features. One technique that is used to overcome this difficulty is optical proximity correction (OPC). In OPC, the features of the memory device are enlarged or shrunk to correct for differences between the target CD and the feature CD, which is formed by the lithography system. Typically, OPC features are processed to correct for differences between the target

CD and the feature CD.

Accordingly, existing OPC techniques sometimes cause a shift in a P shape of the features that are formed by the lithography system. The shift in the P shape causes a change in a feature layout of the memory device that is formed by the lithography system. The change in the feature layout causes a change in the performance of the memory device. Accordingly, what is needed is an OPC technique that causes little or no change in the P shape of the features that are formed by the lithography system. The present invention addresses such a need. The present invention provides a method of forming a memory device that includes forming a plurality of first features. The method includes forming a plurality of second features. The method also includes forming a plurality of third features. The method further includes defining an image coordinate and forming the plurality of third features.

The method still further includes forming a layout of the memory device at a second image coordinate that is offset from the first image coordinate by a spacing distance. The spacing distance is less than the width of a plurality of the third features and the plurality of first and second features. According to the method, the plurality of first, second, and third features are formed from a common pitch. The method also includes defining an image coordinate that is offset from the first image coordinate by a spacing distance. The spacing distance is less than the width of a plurality of the third features and the plurality of first and second features. When the layout of the memory device is formed at the second image coordinate, the spacing distance compensates for the P shape shift that is caused by the OPC technique. The Development of a Rapid Test for Antibiotic Residues in Pork Meat Using a Phot
