Q: Normal vector for surfaces? I'm trying to get the normal vector for a point on a surface. I'm confused by the difference between a unit vector and a normalized vector. My textbook says (in §5.6) that the normal is orthogonal to the gradient of the surface in the point, which is just what a unit vector would do, but it also says that the normal vector is orthogonal to $\nabla\phi$ in equation 5.19. I'm very confused about this difference, especially since a unit vector is just a normal vector with its magnitude set to 1. I think the latter is only making sense if the former is set to 0; otherwise the normal vector will always be orthogonal to itself, which doesn't seem right at all. Can someone explain this to me? A: A normalized vector is a vector which has 1 as its length. Or, to put it in words, a normalized vector is a vector which is unit length. I think the latter is only making sense if the former is set to 0 Correct. I think the former is only making sense if the latter is set to 0 Not correct. can someone explain this to me? The point of normalizing your vector is to ensure that the magnitude of your vector is 1. So you can then represent that vector on the plane with a single angle and distance from a fixed point. Sinead O'Connor has taken to Twitter to reveal that she's planning a legal challenge against the Irish government, because they released her from her second and final divorce decree without her permission. I feel I have not had a choice in the matter. In fact, no one has asked me if I want to live or die. Sinead O'Connor is preparing to sue the Irish government because they released her from her second and final divorce decree without her permission. The Irish Daily Star reports that the singer - who has been embroiled in multiple legal disputes in the past - has taken to Twitter to announce that her next step will be to initiate a legal challenge, citing that it is her constitutional right. The Irish government denied that the singer was a celebrity client, and that it had agreed to a second full judicial separation. However, Sinead is insisting that she has not agreed to the marital breakdown.

The chief executive of one of Canada's biggest banks says the country should be careful not to pick a fight with the United States after Washington imposed new sanctions on the country's biggest aluminum producer. A number of Canadian companies, including Canadian Natural Resources, Canadian Solar and Alcoa, have had to cut ties with Russia because of the sanctions. ADVERTISEMENT "If we're in the front lines, they're shooting at us ... we need to be careful not to be shot at in return. I think our team at the moment is quite capable of dealing with these issues." Terence Corcoran, chief executive of Toronto-based Royal Bank of Canada, told CNN. RBC is an investment bank that is not involved in the Canadian banking industry. Corcoran was appearing on "CNN Money." "The United States has been imposing sanctions on Russia for a number of years, but this has been a major escalation. We don't want a situation where the Canadian economy gets hit." Corcoran said. Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper has said the country is "paying a heavy price" for its "collaboration" with Russia and has raised the matter at the Group of Seven summit in Brussels this week. Former Liberal prime minister Paul Martin said that Canada should respect the decision of the U.S. Treasury, which said in a statement that the new sanctions would punish individuals involved in "malign activities such as cyber attacks." ADVERTISEMENT "It is a good lesson in the way in which you're less likely to get a serious response from the U.S. if you jump up and have a public confrontation in international circles. You're more likely to be bounced back when you back down." Martin, who resigned as prime minister last month, told CNN. Mining is a key industry for Canada and the U.S., so any disruption in supply could have a direct impact on prices and employment. The chief executives of one of Canada's largest utilities, AltaGas, said last month that there were major concerns about aluminum supply, following Canada's decision to cut off aluminum exports to Russia. ADVERTISEMENT "There is no question that this has placed a further strain on our ability to export aluminum at this time. If there is no
