Well, there are many examples of footprints found in the fossilized remains of animals that lived during the time when the ice sheets covered most of the northern hemisphere. One of the best-known cases is the Trilobite-shaped Tracks- Trilobites were burrowing arthropods from the Cambrian Period, and fossilized footprints of Trilobites have been found since the early 20th century. They are found today in Manitoba, Canada, where a group called the Durness Ice Road Geological Park Study Club has discovered dozens of individual tracks. These footprints, some of which are preserved in amber, were found in a field near the river of the same name. The river was once part of the ancient glacial Lake Lucerne, which was a tributary of the Rhone River. Three years ago, a rainstorm uncovered these imprints in a tilled field. The field was planted with spring wheat, and the furrows were now filled with sediment and pollen. When the plant stems began to grow a year later, the pressure from their roots and the tread of footsteps caused the footprints to be preserved. Adventures of a Scientist: Ice Age Footprints The prints are about the size of a golf ball, and they have all four feet showing in front of the body and two visible behind. The size and shape of the prints indicate that they belong to a trilobite. It took decades of walking around that field to find these prints, and they are now among the most valuable

Casein kinase II-mediated phosphorylation of heterogeneous nuclear ribonucleoprotein K promotes its translocation from nucleoli to nucleoplasm.

Heterogeneous nuclear ribonucleoprotein K (hnRNP K) plays an important role in post-transcriptional gene regulation. Previous studies have revealed that its phosphorylation by casein kinase II (CK-II) promotes its interaction with RNA, and the absence of hnRNP K impedes the nucleocytoplasmic transport of mRNAs [Chiou, K.-H., Tsai, S.-L., Yeh, P.-C., Hsueh, C.-S., Wang, M.-J., & Chan, C. H. (1997) J. Biol. Chem. 272, 17380-17385]. The present study demonstrated that hnRNP K could be phosphorylated by CK-II in vitro and in vivo. The N-terminal fragment, hnRNP K(1-119), exhibited the lowest apparent CK-II activity with serine residue 82 as the major phosphorylation site. Transient expression of wild type hnRNP K, but not a mutant form of hnRNP K in which serine 82 was replaced by alanine, in MDCK cells resulted in the nucleocytoplasmic translocation of the endogenous hnRNP K. By microinjecting the wild type hnRNP K into the nuclei of living NIH3T3 cells, we found that hnRNP K was distributed exclusively in the nucleoplasm, consistent with the results from the in vitro phosphorylation experiments. In contrast, the mutant form of hnRNP K was still retained in the nucleoli. These results suggest that the nucleoplasmic localization of hnRNP K is regulated in part by its phosphorylation by CK-II. Premier Kathleen Wynne's Liberal government is winning over the business community with its ambitious agenda to create an Ontario "knowledge economy" - but there is a blind spot in the strategy for companies looking to grow in the province. They may be surprised to learn that despite the rapid growth of the sector's "knowledge economy" in the past five years, Ontario has some of the most high-tech companies and universities per capita in the world, says Royce
