Is there a parallelism in reading and interpreting data and text from the same object? I mean, is it better to read a text in English or a picture in Arabic, in a foreign language, because in both cases we need to share visual information? A: This is indeed a genuine question, and I do think that there are at least two relevant aspects to consider: the attentional focus on the text to read, and the perception of the whole event. On both accounts, you are right to suggest that there can be a difference. For example, you can read the text with a deep focus on the literal meaning of the text, or you can read it more in a holistic fashion, just because, in that moment, that is what you wish to do. Or you can read the text in a more "ancient style", which, although possibly not as literal as reading the text in a more modern style, can actually use the same grammatical structure, is also less "attentionally consuming", and in general can be read more quickly, due to the use of more automatic processes. Of course, the level of attention that one actually applies to any text (and in particular to the text in question) can also depend on other factors, such as emotions, the type of task at hand (in a wider sense than the reading-task-specific one you mentioned), and so on. On a meta-level, however, I think
