Erstwhile known as the "paintball" war has not been going too well for the United States, with the country being able to boast that they have shot down more drones than the Taliban. Even then, with those drones that were the targets of the Air Force, chances of them coming back to target the US with their missiles were rather high.

Now with the advent of the Reaper drones, which have no hard landing ability and are mostly undetected by people, the game has changed somewhat. So how can the Air Force shoot down these drones? The answer is relatively simple. The Air Force has been working on some robot stuff and these robots could be put to use. In fact, those drones have inspired several robots to be developed.

One such robot is called the "Robocoy", which is a remotely piloted robot that's not only an automated drone, but can be called upon by the US Air Force in combat situations, on ground and in the air. It can carry out certain tasks, such as controlled landings, scouting, search and rescue missions, and getting into places. With the help of AI, the "Robocoy" will be able to take up the call of the Air Force to shoot down drones that have been operating too close to US bases in Afghanistan.

It's a robot that has been trained to bring this to the fore and carry out its assigned tasks. Back in 2010, the Air Force started doing some research on how to combat the drones and came across the idea of using robots to shoot them down. That's how "Robocoy" was born, a robot that is pretty easy to handle and can work as per the needs of the US Air Force. Like other robot stuff, the "Robocoy" can be controlled remotely and has the ability to make teleoperated decisions as well. It can be

Portable VoiceMacro is an application designed to improve precisely this aspect since it enables you to communicate with your computer via voice commands, by resorting to hotkeys, or moving your mouse in customized ways. Donald Trump praised Brazil's new President Jair Bolsonaro, now in office, on Sunday evening, hours after his election victory against Fernando Haddad. "Well, I must say - I just received a call from President-elect Trump and congratulated him on his big victory," Trump said in remarks in the Oval Office with the Brazilian president. "He just won a big victory, and congratulations," he added. Bolsonaro, a former federal army captain, defeated left-leaning candidate Haddad in the presidential election last night by roughly 66 percent of the vote in the second round of voting, despite an opposition boycott. "Just think what I am going to do for our country in terms of trade and military and everything else," Trump added. The U.S. President went on to mock President Haddad by posing for the cameras with a meme depicting Bolsonaro as a cowboy. "Looks like a little tough guy, doesn't it?" Trump said. "But he's actually a nice person," he added. Trump met with Bolsonaro in New York earlier this year. The two leaders had then discussed the fight against ISIS and climate change, but appeared to have little room for meaningful progress. Bolsonaro's victory means that he will inherit a potentially ragged economy from Haddad and a much more combustible political scene. The far-right leader was a police officer who was previously criticized for encouraging violence and condoning torture. "We have to do it with him, because that is the president we have, and not go back to the old leadership," Brazilian President-elect Jair Bolsonaro said, a day after running against Fernando Haddad in the nation's presidential election. "We will have to work," he said. Haddad had placed himself in Brazil's center-left coalition with the support of the Workers' Party, which had backed him from the start, and was backed by outgoing President Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva. But that has not been enough to save his presidency.

What's New in the Portable VoiceMacro?

Portable voice macros to control almost any application. Can execute macros using voice commands or hotkeys. Assign hotkeys to execute macros, for example Alt + F4 or any other combination. Create macros while listening to voice cues, for example, Macros while I am driving. Define macros for using hotkeys or mouse gestures. Assign active macros to a specific window. Import macros from external applications. Import macros from external applications. Unlimited number of macros, each with their own profile. Portable voice macros can be created and assigned to a window, whether it is active or not. A macro's description can therefore be created easily, what with adding any necessary instruction or cue by voice. Thus, you can listen to the one you are going to create and create it by pressing the assigned hotkeys. Assign one macro for a hotkey, for example, `+D+4#` to act as `+D` for 4th time in the current file. In such way, you can easily control your game, movie player or even your email client while making sure that a single hotkey manages to do what several commands would have done. Imports macros from any Windows file, creating a whole collection of those you have saved separately. This is a handy feature of the software since you can then take them with you and use them wherever you find them convenient. Macros can be activated while a window is active or not, making sure it applies to the instance the commands will run in, whether you are listening to their cues in process or not. A key aspect to note is that macros can be shared by groups of people, what with each of them having their own profiles of macros to use for a given application. By doing this, you can ensure that people of your organisation work on the same set of macros so as to avoid clashes between them. With each macro holding a description and data about the target application, as well as information about which profile it belongs to, you can make sure that every call you make is formatted the right way. Allows you to make customized macros. Of course, no application would be complete without being able to create customized macros, which is why the software we have at hand is equipped with a mode in which you can do exactly that. By assigning hotkeys to execute a macro, you can make sure that your macros are carried out as you would have done them manually, adding a
