If you use free online photo editing software instead of Photoshop, make sure it gives you the same fine-tuned control over the image that the standard Photoshop does. In this chapter, I show you how to use Photoshop's many tools, as well as its effects and filters, to change the color of your photographs. I also share tips and techniques that can help you speed up your workflow as well as learn to correct for color casts and exposure inconsistencies. If you have a lot of images to correct, I suggest you check out Adobe Photoshop Lightroom, a handy free online tool that enables you to manage your images, correct them, and share them with the world without having to have Photoshop installed on your computer. What can you do with Photoshop? If you've used Photoshop, you have most likely learned to use the tools in the following three sections: Layer Palettes: This palette enables you to use layers to manipulate an image. Each layer is treated as an editing layer. Any change you make to any layer is reflected in all layers above it. You can create as many layers as you like. Image Menu: Access this panel by selecting the menu icon on the side of the screen (shown in the margin in the figure) and choosing Image⇒Image Options. The Image Menu contains all the standard editing tools, as well as tools for adjusting the levels in the brightness/contrast and hue/saturation sliders. Layers Panel: You can access this panel by double-clicking the tab below the image window, as shown in the margin. When you use this panel, you can select a color and then drag it onto any part of an image, or you can select a color by clicking to place your cursor in the image below the currently active layer, and then double-click to place the color beneath the active layer. If you double-click a layer, you can edit the colors in the layer's fill. The options for each color are listed below the layer, and you can make adjustments, such as changing the brightness, saturation, and hue. When you double-click on the Layer Mask, you can use the Mask tools on the Q: How to remove columns from.csv file using powershell I have.csv file containing couple rows of data. But I need to remove some columns. I want to remove columns 2-6 from the.csv file. Its easy to remove them by using a simple example. But can we remove them by using powershell(I can do it in Excel too)? A: I have used Excel functions in PowerShell before - see my blog post for more detail. In your specific case, you could use the Excel Export-Csv function to save the result in a different format then use the Import-Csv function to reload the new data into PowerShell. A similar approach would be to write a script to remove each column of data and use the import-csv function.
