Expectant management of patients with stage IA endometrial carcinoma in Japan. Endometrial carcinoma is the most common gynecologic malignancy among Japanese women. In most countries, although the rate of endometrial carcinoma has been on the increase, the incidence of early-stage disease has been decreasing. Nevertheless, endometrial carcinoma is still the most common cancer in Japan and has the highest case-fatality rate among gynecologic malignancies in Japan. Cervicovaginal examination should be completed, and it should be supplemented with transvaginal ultrasonography when endometrial thickness is  $\geq 5$  mm. According to Japanese guidelines, all women should be seen after a hysteroscopy with endometrial curettage, and minimal residual disease in the uterine cavity should be detected. The level of evidence is low. Women without risk factors should receive no further treatment. Surgery or a simple hysterectomy can be performed for postmenopausal women with stage IA endometrial carcinoma. Women with risk factors, such as obesity, age  $>60$  years, nulliparity, uterine bleeding or cervical bleeding, or heavy menstrual bleeding should be offered a simple hysterectomy (including bilateral salpingo-oophorectomy). Women who refuse surgery can be offered
