It is known that natural seawater, whether from the open sea or from a fish pond or other source, contains a number of impurities and usually contains nitric acid in concentrations of from about 150 to 400 g/l, depending on whether it was taken from the open sea or from a fish pond. The disposal of polluted seawater is an expensive proposition. Frequently it is preferred to recover the nitric acid from the contaminated seawater in a simpler and cheaper way so as to recover the nitric acid for reuse. The most common method of recovering nitric acid from seawater is by treating the seawater with sulfuric acid so as to convert the nitrate ions into nitrites and sulfuric acid and by then distilling the nitrites to obtain nitric acid. The presence of a number of impurities, such as heavy metals, alkalis, chlorides and organics results in corrosion problems, which are due in part to the presence of iron in sea water. In an alternative method, the sea water may be cleaned by dissolving the iron in seawater with hydrogen peroxide to form ferric hydroxide which can be separated by subsequent filtration, prior to being treated by distillation of the nitrites to obtain a crude nitric acid. In the practice of this method, the concentration of nitric acid is still normally less than 100 g/l. In another method of producing pure nitric acid, sea water is passed through a filter bed composed of filter discs which have been placed in a basket and suspended in a water-containing tank. The carrier members supporting the discs are composed of a corrosion-resistant material and preferably have an internal diameter of about 15 cm and a thickness of about 2 cm. The nitric acid is removed from the filter apparatus through a convenient piping system to b7e8fdf5c8
