Read More...Population-based surveys are conducted to monitor the geographical and temporal trends of disease and to provide basic information on environmental factors that affect the health of the population. From 1980 through 1985, the Connecticut Tumor Registry (CTR) has contributed to several population-based cancer case-control studies. Data from the CTR have been used to characterize temporal changes in the incidence of cancer and to evaluate the relationship between endogenous and exogenous factors and the etiology of specific cancers. Current research involving the CTR includes the following topics: (a) temporal trends in the incidence of cancers of the cervix, corpus uteri, fallopian tube, ovary, kidney, non-Hodgkin's lymphoma, melanoma, and leukemia; (b) relationships between endogenous factors and risk of specific cancers (e.g., oral contraceptive use and risk of uterine cervix cancer); (c) dietary factors and risk of ovarian cancer; (d) risk of death due to cancer after a cancer diagnosis; (e) risk of several common cancers among people living in high risk communities (smokers, older women, and those born in specific years); (f) the relationship between environmental factors and risk of specific cancers; (g) cost effectiveness of screening methods for detecting cervical dysplasia; (h) the relationship between menopausal status and risk of ovarian cancer; (i) the relationship between coronary heart disease and the mortality from breast cancer; and (j) the relationship between use of methadone and lung cancer risk. Statistical methods used by the CTR include cancer surveillance as well as the development, validation, and application of cancer risk assessment models. Most recently, a comprehensive analysis of the prevalence of prior hysterectomy and subsequent risk of uterine cervix and ovarian cancers has been completed. %.
