CareUEyesConsequences of an extrapericardial approach for coronary artery bypass grafting: evaluation by three-dimensional echocardiographic reconstruction of the beating heart in a cardiac surgery laboratory. The results of the extrapericardial approach for coronary artery bypass grafting were evaluated by three-dimensional echocardiographic reconstruction of the beating heart after the operation in a cardiac surgery laboratory. The heart was exposed from left thoracotomy and exteriorized. The grafting sites were exposed to facilitate precise bypass procedures. The right coronary artery and the left anterior descending artery was bypassed in the left and right anterior oblique views of the beating heart, respectively. The bypass procedure was performed in the left anterior oblique view. Three-dimensional reconstruction of the coronary arteries was performed by the mid-ventricular and apical views of the beating heart from the extrapericardial approach. The technique was applied to 20 patients and the results were evaluated. The grafts of the right coronary artery and the left anterior descending artery were placed in the proximal and distal portions of the right and left coronary arteries, respectively. The ascending aorta was isolated and replaced. In all patients, the bypass circuit was completed by the proximal anastomosis of the grafts. The adequate images of the beating heart were available during the procedure. In addition, the course of the proximal coronary anastomoses and distal anastomoses in the left anterior oblique view, which is important for performing a distal anastomosis at the distal portion of the coronary arteries, could be assessed. Three-dimensional echocardiography facilitates visualization and evaluation of the beating heart in the cardiac surgery laboratory. Establishment of a rat model of acute brain stem encephalitis
