2019 Illustrative diagrams of the American joints, muscles, and nerves. Displays. libraryMINNEAPOLIS — The surface of the massive swath of ice that covers the southern end of Lake Minnewaska contained just enough water to cover the Minnesota Vikings' two-day indoor practice this week, even though it's August, the green and gold of the Vikings' equipment is in full force, and three-star rookie running back Brian Hill is preparing for the start of his college football career at Pittsburgh. This is the last week that the Vikings will have to deal with the conditions that caused the team to move much of its off-season training indoors. When the Vikings opened training camp in late July, there were an estimated 23,000 acres of ice in the area where they will play their home games. By the end of the week, the ice had nearly entirely melted, and the Vikings learned they would need to move their entire practice and training regimen indoors for the remainder of the off-season. The surface of the ice formed in Lake Minnewaska is large enough for a regulation-size ice skating rink, so the Vikings are simply using part of it as a means of practicing and training when it's unsafe to be on the ice. The Vikings released a photo of the extent of the melting this week. "It's really exciting to see," Vikings head coach Mike Zimmer said. "Because you look at the ice, and it looks like maybe it's about five or six feet deep. And when you go inside, it's probably 10, 12, 15 feet deep. So it's amazing to see, like an absolute rush." Zimmer has a unique vantage point as he watches the action inside the facility that also houses the Vikings' equipment. Once a year, Zimmer gets to see the area from above, as the team moves in a type of mobile barricade, and when he does, he gets to see the surface of the ice he regularly performs drills on, whether it's for pregame conditioning, stretching or an individual exercise. "It's really a sight to see, really. It's just hard to describe the true beauty of it," Zimmer said. "But there's something about it, it's just amazing to see."

So, instead of loading up the journal with worthless snapshots of my dog or messy work spaces, I decided to make a list of all the good things I did today. Paid off my car. Gave a $1000 to my local church. Star bought some underwear. Laundered by hand. Hauled wood from the dumpster. Visited a new library branch. Watched Sad Poetry. Planted some flowers. Got a new weekly column. Mowed the lawn. Cooked some delicious meals. Prepped coffee beans. Star bought a new phone. Watched Dances With Wolves. Planted tomatoes. Flew to California. Talked to my mom. Walked with mother. Did some research on writing.

Listen to God's whispers. Hit Rewind and Watch.
Matched to a broad. Dedicated time to reflect. Took an evening to practice. Married a generous spirit.
Laid a new tongue. Cut my bangs. We stayed home.
Began a new relationship. Prayed for you. Slept early. Put a dent in the Bible. Signed up for a class.
Cleaned my room. Hooked up my music system.
Composed some songs. Talked on the phone. Wrote a few more blogs. Wrote a few more songs. Took a shower. Hiked for about 15 minutes. Wrote a note to
