Part 3: Crysis Installation Guide â€" Part 1: Best practices for handling people's logins and passwords? As a website grows, and eventually gets served by a server on our own, the possibility of hacking grows. I am sure many other places have the same fears. As much as possible, I'd like to prevent bad people from getting into the server. I also want to make sure that the method of logging in with passwords is secure. What is the best practice for handling logins and passwords? Are there any general recommendations for high-level security? A: Do not store passwords at all. If a site needs authentication, then require it. Instead, use a user/password based login system (like OpenID) and provide that to your users. That way, the only account you need is your openid account and you don't need to remember any passwords (and you don't ever have to deal with storing passwords).
