Ribonucleotide Reductase Function and Nonneural Hematologic Malignancies: Highlights from Selected Published Studies. Hematologic malignancies, including lymphomas and leukemias, arise from the hematopoietic system. Many of these malignancies are associated with genetic mutations, giving rise to the emergence of specific sub-types. One common result of these mutations is alterations in the function of ribonucleotide reductase, a critical enzyme for DNA synthesis. This result is important as the ribonucleotide reductase is both essential for cellular viability and a target for many types of cancer therapy. Moreover, many types of cancer, including lymphomas and leukemias, are sensitive to inhibition of ribonucleotide reductase. Here we review the literature that discusses alterations in ribonucleotide reductase function and discuss the impact these have on the development of hematologic malignancies and how they may be targeted by specific therapies. H.A.M., M.H.H., J.B.J., W.K., S.K.S., H.S.P., P.A., A.J.S. and S.T.V. conducted the review and provided input into the manuscript.
