The Epstein-Barr virus (EBV) and its associated antigens were reported to be associated with gastric carcinoma. We investigated the relationship between EBV-related gastric cancers, in particular, and the age of the patients, sex, histological type, size, location, and macroscopic classification. Fifty-seven cases of surgically resected gastric carcinomas were examined. Archival formalin-fixed and paraffin-embedded tissues were used for histological and immunohistochemical examinations. Immunohistochemical examination for EBV-encoded small nuclear RNA (EBER-1) and latent membrane protein-1 (LMP-1) was performed. Our immunohistochemical investigation revealed that 6 (6.8%) of 90 of the cases were positive for EBER-1 and 51 (29.8%) of 170 of the cases were positive for LMP-1. However, the presence of EBER-1 or LMP-1 was observed in 5.7% or 19.8% of the cases, respectively. A significant difference was not observed between the positive and negative cases regarding the histological type, size, location, and macroscopic classification. No significant difference was observed between the patients with or without positive EBV-related antigens regarding the sex, age, and survival period. The size and location of the cancers did not significantly differ between the EBER-1-positive and negative cases. There was no significant difference between the LMP-1-positive
