For each rule, I have added a running total. The final column in the table shows the return on the total. Note that the results are not to be interpreted as absolute numbers. It is all relative to the equation (1 / (1 + rate)^n), if n is larger than 1. The horizontal axes are presented so that the results are understandable. For a detailed version of the results, see the comments in the source code. For the other tools, only Grammarly shows a positive return.Total Pageviews Thursday, February 25, 2016 The past month has been a whirlwind. Graduate school is back in full swing and I'm swamped with assignments, classes, and projects. In other words, not enough time for card making! I haven't been on reddit for a week, either. I may need to check that addiction out though, because there are always some pretty cool images and interesting conversations happening. In other news, I had a little time to pull out some papers and a couple things, so I decided to take a chance and venture into a brand new technique. With the help of the new Mega Shapes catalog and a few other supplies, I came up with this.... It's a background with just a splash of color and depth. As a background, it works a little differently than a traditional background. With a d0c515b9f4
