The mominities in which society thinks outside the box are the ones that make for the best stories. Think about how different the action-adventure genre would be if Peter MacGregor had stopped out on a whim to go on a road trip with Mackenzie Foy or if he had gone on a road trip with Billy Crudup or if he had gone on a road trip with Philip Seymour Hoffman. The road trip in Into the Woods is a story that can be seen as a modern day version of Cinderella, where the boy meets the girl and we see the old king and queen and stepmother and stepdaughter get together in their own kind of happily ever after. Most mainstream movies have internal dramas that take place without the filmmakers knowing if they are going to be liked, played, or appreciated by a wide audience. No one can know for sure, it's a gamble. When a team on a budget decides to make a movie that will hopefully make millions, they still are not sure if people are going to get it. It is not that hard to understand if a viewer is going to be interested in seeing a film that they are not going to like. The hope for those making a film is that people will see it and be able to take it at face value, and if they do like it then it becomes a film that people won't be able to get out of their heads. Into the Woods is a perfect example of a film that has an audience that does love it and is smart enough to make sense of the film even if it is not one that the filmmaker originally set out to make. There are a lot of good movies out there that no one has ever heard about before that just never got the funding to be seen by the public. If you want to see a movie that opens in the VOD world (or direct to DVD for you westerners), stop watching television, stop hanging out on social media sites like Facebook, stop looking at TMZ, TMZ Sports, or even the Enquirer if you are from Louisville, and watch these movies. Chances are pretty good that you will probably never see them again. At the end of Into the Woods, we see the mother with her child who is asleep in her arms, 648931e174
