Xanthogranulomatous prostatitis. Xanthogranulomatous prostatitis is an uncommon chronic inflammatory lesion of the prostate gland. Surgical or medical therapy is usually required. The pathogenesis of this disease is unknown. The condition may be confused with carcinoma and with tuberculosis. We present three cases of xanthogranulomatous prostatitis and review the literature on the subject. This condition may be confused with carcinoma and with tuberculosis. In the manufacture of semiconductor devices, after the formation of gate electrode structures on a semiconductor substrate, e.g. a silicon substrate, on which active and passive circuit elements have been formed, a metallization process is performed in which the circuitry is connected to the substrate. During the metallization process, a dielectric layer is deposited overlying the gate electrodes and in which openings are formed so that the portions of the substrate located between the gate electrodes may be exposed. Thereafter, one or more layers of metal are deposited and filled in the openings to electrically interconnect the gate electrodes and underlying active or passive circuit elements. In general, the quality of the metallization layer formed on the dielectric layer may be significantly improved by stabilizing the surface of the dielectric layer prior to depositing a metal layer thereon. Chemical-mechanical polishing (CMP) is often used for planarizing a semiconductor substrate surface. To perform a CMP process, a polishing pad is provided having a resilient backing sheet which contacts the surface of the substrate to be polished. Polishing slurry having abrasive particles dispersed in an aqueous medium is applied to the polishing pad. To polish and planarize the substrate, the pad and the substrate are rotated about their central axes while relative motion is made between the substrate and the pad by either rotating the pad or the substrate. The CMP process is used to planarize the surface of the substrate and remove and/or planarize excess oxide layers and other contaminants formed during previous processing operations. One disadvantage of the conventional process for forming the conductive pattern of a semiconductor device is that several layers must be formed overlying the substrate in order to have a completed device. As a result, each conductive layer has an associated coefficient of thermal expansion (CTE) which results in thermal stresses being applied to the substrate, e.g., the underlying silicon substrate, during subsequent processing operations. These thermal

If you thought Donald Trump's presidency was bad, just wait. One of the themes of "The Great Hack" is that the Russians, as part of their efforts to tip the 2016 election in Trump's favor, used their vast social media profiles to turn millions of American Facebook users into "bots" — machines that pumped out pro-Trump content on the platform. That's bad enough, but what makes "The Great Hack" even worse is that the digital cat's paws managed to get what's going on even worse. In a section of the HBO documentary that is word-for-word identical to material published by the New York Times in January, but filmed in the summer of 2016, a former Yahoo security expert named Alex Stamos describes how, when it was uncovered, the biggest of the Russian troll farms, the Internet Research Agency, had been pushing fake news stories and "reaching out to people who care about their communities." According to Stamos, he and other current and former Yahoo employees ran into the trolls at a bar in a resort town about 20 miles north of Washington. A former colleague of Stamos named Regin Newsham, the current president of the Internet Research Agency, got into a fight with another patron who apparently didn't like one of the pro-Kremlin sites that Newsham was promoting. "Alex and I came to the defense of Regin and Regin spent the next 45 minutes and change trying to explain to the guy why he should be criticizing Russian propaganda," Newsham recalls in the film. Because of who Newsham was and what he worked for — the Internet Research Agency was a huge and well-funded operation that specialized in fomenting social discord online, trolling people and pushing out news and information designed to be viewed by Americans — the situation was out of control. "Alex and I ended up stopping this fight," Newsham says. "But after that, the guy would not talk to anyone anymore." The Internet Research Agency was a small operation, but it was one of a group of companies and employees of companies based in St. Petersburg, Russia, whose meddling in the U.S. presidential election was so extensive that they were allegedly ordered to do it by Vladimir Putin. It's not clear from the documentary whether the person who ordered
