Neurological disorders and depression are frequently associated with each other. They are responsible for substantial morbidity and mortality. There are important differences between depression and neurological disorders concerning its course and its treatment. In neurological disorders, the prognosis of the patients remains generally poor, even after full recovery. On the contrary, in depression, the prognosis of the patients after recovery depends on the treatment. This article describes the psychotherapeutic and pharmacological treatment of depression in a psychiatric hospital. Among the pharmacological treatments, electroconvulsive therapy is very efficient when performed correctly. On the other hand, anticholinergic medications have a strong risk of eliciting extrapyramidal symptoms. Numerous psychotherapeutic techniques are also available. These techniques are often used in routine daily practice and can be applied by a psychotherapist. The psychotherapeutic methods that are the most commonly used are cognitive and behavioral therapies. However, there are other psychotherapeutic techniques that appear to be efficient, such as systemic psychotherapies. For depression, the major challenge in the care of patients is to provide the appropriate pharmacological treatment. A research is needed to identify the patients who will respond better to various antidepressant medications. Brachytherapy as a treatment for vaginal carcinoma. The local control and survival outcome for women with vaginal carcinoma has remained unchanged over the past two decades
