Neural stem cells and progenitor cells are undifferentiated cells that persist in adult and developing brains and can give rise to neurons and glia. The neural stem cells and progenitor cells are located in two regions of the mammalian brain: the subventricular zone of the lateral ventricles, and the subgranular zone of the hippocampal dentate gyrus. These two regions can be considered to represent the adult stem cell niches of the brain. This proposal concerns the mechanisms regulating the differentiation of neural stem cells.A prospective comparison of umbilical vein, peripheral vein, and umbilical artery Doppler blood flow waveforms in the assessment of fetal well-being. The authors compared Doppler blood flow waveforms from the umbilical vein, peripheral vein, and umbilical artery in 280 pregnancies at 24 to 40 weeks of gestation and examined their relation with neonatal outcome. Of the three sites studied, the umbilical artery was detected in the majority of cases, most commonly with a positive flow acceleration time. Four (4) nonreassuring fetal status cases and three (3) cases of neonatal asphyxia were identified in the presence of a normal fetal umbilical artery blood flow waveform. Two (2) fetuses in nonreassuring fetal status group had normal umbilical vein and abnormal arterial blood flow waveforms. Of the four (4) nonreassuring fetal status cases with an abnormal umbilical vein blood flow waveform, one (1) had normal arterial blood flow waveform. When the fetuses with normal arterial blood flow waveform in nonreassuring fetal status were compared with the 100
