particularly to data protection for storage area networks (SAN). 2. Description of Related Art A storage area network (SAN) is an example of a network which is used to interconnect storage devices. A primary function of a storage area network is to provide connectivity between a storage controller and multiple storage devices. Typically, a storage area network is used to store large amounts of data such as in database systems, web servers, transaction processing systems, and the like. The storage area network may consist of as few as two storage devices or as many as thousands of storage devices. A typical storage area network is comprised of a plurality of storage devices which are connected to a switch. The switch serves as a transportation mechanism for storage devices and a connection mechanism between multiple storage area networks. There are many different ways of implementing SAN's and the differences are well known. Within each implementation, there may be a variety of physical configurations. However, some of the physical architectures are called "one-level" and some are called "multi-level". In a one-level SAN, there is a single switch or multiple switches which connect a single storage controller to multiple storage devices in a logical array. In a multi-level SAN, there are multiple switches which connect multiple storage controllers with multiple storage devices within a logical array. The architecture of the

We have dedicated many hours to this program so that you can download our Office Document in a few. Fraud, flimflam and fakery are in the air this weekend as the Exbury Domestic contest, one of the oldest and most prestigious dining competitions in the country, continues. The event takes place this Saturday night at Exbury Gardens, with the winners announced on Sunday morning at the Royal Automobile Club. Last year's winner was Laura Kuller, who was a guest at Wimbledon. This year, the pool is headed by former model Gabriella Bower and her fellow competitors include London schoolgirl Theresa Arndt. Arndt won the title at the tender age of 13 in 1995. The annual invitation-only final is hosted by the RAC and is judged by a panel of professionals from across the catering sector. Due to the large calibre of the food on show at the event, the venue is set up with a dedicated dining room for the judges and their staff. After the tasting, the winners progress through a second phase of judging, where they face off against each other for the title. The grand finale ends with a dinner for some of the guests who have been dining with the chefs for the past few days. This year's champion will be crowned by the absence of a head chef, after Restaurant magazine's restaurant reviewer Mark Sargeant left the Country Club, where he is head chef, after five months' on the job. Head chef of the Exbury Gardens is Andrew Goh, a highly respected chef in London, as well as having been in charge of London's Park Lane Club and the Aquavit restaurant at The Dorchester. On Saturday night, the six finalists will make the promised effort to recrisp their recipes, which in many cases are the creation of chef, Goh. They will face the full force of Saturday's service, including 12 staff cooking in the dining room, the efficient brigade of waiters and kitchen and bottlewasher, all of whom are committed to ensuring that the event goes according to plan. All the finalists will have been prepping their dishes in the kitchen over the past few days. Each contestant has the opportunity to have his/
