Lorain – Magistrates have declared a ban on using downtown parking meters for 10 days to protest $120 million in underfunding by the mayor and city council. “Make no mistake about it, our city is in crisis,” said Mayor Joe Gaulrapp, who is chairman of the Ohio Citizen Action Advisory Committee on Municipal Spending, whose recommendation had been that meters be removed until the matter was resolved. The 200-square-foot meters cost $5 to $10 to use, depending on the amount of time people park there. The council didn’t make any changes in the 10 years that the meters were operated under a rate based on the meter number, reports said. If the council doesn’t make a reduction in meter costs of $1 million a year the city will pay a $500,000 fine under the Ohio Revised Code, said Gaulrapp. He added, “The city has no plan to improve this situation.” The council did not act on the recommendation of OCAAC, who said the city would be better off continuing to operate meters on a time-and-a-half rate rather than spending money on ticketing meters in the downtown area, Gaulrapp said. “We are not blind to the financial hardships that the residents of the city are experiencing,” he said. “However, there is no easy way to deal with these problems.” Eight people were arrested last week for allegedly blocking access to meters. The mayor said the next step will be to have the council approve the sale of the parking meters to a private company that he will propose. He noted other local governments have had problems with parking meters and have sold them. “It is time to fix this,” he said. During the last two months of 2018, there were 37,388 violations issued, compared to 33,599 during the same period in 2017 and 18,846 in 2016, when there were no meters. The city hasn’t been performing well when it comes to capital improvements over the past 10 years, Gaulrapp said. “I felt that the council was unwilling to invest in what are important items to the city’s future,” he said. “We have had an ongoing problem getting the council to focus on improving our infrastructure.” Gaulra
