This invention relates to a light emitting device and a method of manufacture thereof. There are a number of different approaches in the prior art to producing a light emitting device. Amongst the more recent approaches are methods which involve transfer printing of organic electroluminescent layers. The properties of these layers include light emission in a number of regions of the visible and infrared spectra. In some prior art light emitting devices there is a considerable degree of variation in the thickness of the organic electroluminescent layer, which in turn affects the wavelength and luminescent intensity of the light emitted. It is an object of the present invention to obviate or mitigate one or more of the disadvantages of the prior art. According to a first aspect of the present invention there is provided a method of manufacturing a light emitting device having a patterned layer of a first material and a second material adjacent the patterned layer, the method comprising the steps of: applying a thin seed layer of the first material on the surface of the second material, and patterning the seed layer to expose regions of the second material, to form a patterned layer of the first material on the regions of the second material. Preferably the seed layer is applied by sputtering the first material from a target, or by electroplating the first material from an anode. The patterning step preferably comprises masking the regions of the seed layer with a masking material and subjecting the seed layer to an etching process. The masking material preferably comprises an organic material and the etching process preferably comprises a reactive ion etching process. Preferably the seed layer comprises a metal, a metal oxide, a nitride, a nitride oxide or a semiconductor. Preferably the first material is a hole transport material and the second material comprises an emissive material for electroluminescent light emission. Preferably the patterned layer of the first material comprises a second material, and the second material is applied to the patterned layer of the first material by a physical vapour deposition process. The second material may comprise any material useful in any electroluminescent device, for example a light emitting device. According to a second aspect of the present invention there is provided a light emitting device comprising a base layer of a first material adjacent a patterned layer of a second material, the patterned layer having a surface of the second material exposed, the patterned layer of the second material being surrounded

BUDAPEST (Reuters) - Since coming to power in May, Viktor Orban's far-right nationalist Fidesz party has pushed through a series of controversial, often anti-EU, laws, including the introduction of what it says are measures to counter immigration. FILE PHOTO: Hungarian Prime Minister Viktor Orban looks on during a meeting with ambassadors of European Union member states in Budapest, Hungary, December 15, 2017. REUTERS/Bernadett Szabo/File Photo The legislation has brought hundreds of thousands of people onto the streets of Budapest, a city where Orban has ruled with an iron fist for a decade, to protest against Fidesz's legislative package, which they say attacks their rights. "Those laws were a big mistake," said Erika Fazekas, head of the Pro Humanitate association, which organizes what it calls a "Longest March" against Fidesz that attracted over 130,000 people, or around one fifth of the capital's population, to an open-air rally on Friday. "We have heard from our representative abroad how much (Orban's) behavior will cost the Hungarian nation," she told Reuters in an interview. "We have closed borders and they have closed their hearts," she said. In addition to banning left-wing rallies, Orban's government has intervened to cancel broadcasting licenses of critical media, curbed freedom of expression and at least partially abolished constitutional checks and balances. Critics say the measures are aimed at imposing Fidesz's conservative, nationalist views and power grab on Hungary's mainly young and liberal-minded population. "The government wants to reorder Hungarian society, and the government is the only one to decide who can be a Hungarian," said Fazekas. "We are not against foreigners," said her colleague Anikó Baki, a sociology professor. "But the government wants to control borders, and after controlling the borders you can control the other aspects." "MARXIST", "ANTI-HUMAN RIGHTS" The Budapest protests have been dwarfed by street protests in other cities across the country, and by demonstrations in smaller towns, last year more than 100 people were injured when police cracked down on demonstrators.
