* Photoshopeo: This online tutorial for beginners on the www.photoshop.com website is a great place to start with Photoshop and learn how to use many of the tools and features. This tutorial is the ultimate resource for learning how to use Photoshop. If you don't have the time to read a tutorial, this video tutorial is a good alternative (to the author's displeasure). * * * #

A Photoshop Glossary Here are a few of the most common terms used in Photoshop. Many of the terms are the same as found in other imaging or graphic design software. However, there are a few terms that specifically apply to Photoshop. * Blur: The most common type of blur is the Gaussian blur, which is blur that uses a Gaussian weighting. It is done in the Blur Filter found in the Filter menu (Figure 16-4). The default for this is 100%, but you can change it to any other percentage value. Figure 16-4:

The Blur filter options in the Filter menu.

Note: If you've used Gaussian blur before (as you may in other software), you will notice that Photoshop applies this filter differently.

Gaussian blur requires you to press Shift+Ctrl+Z (the keyboard shortcut for Undo) after making each movement, whereas in Photoshop you simply press Ctrl+Z and the tool is ready to use. * Burn: To selectively darken an image in an image editor, including Photoshop, you use the Burn Filter. This filter can be found in the Filter menu (Figure 16-5).

When applied, it usually removes some of the white areas, which darkens the rest of the image. If you use a dark background and a lighter image, the result can be interesting. This effect is also found in other image-editing software, including some of the old-school DOS editors.  * * * # Don't Use Photoshop's Burn Filter on White Surfaces The Burn filter can do some interesting things with images, including very bright and dark areas, but it is usually best used on nonwhite areas. Too much of a white area tends to burn the colors to black, which makes the image look really bad. When using this filter, it's a good idea to always ensure that you

“What is that?” “What happened to that guy?” “I don’t believe that!” “I think so”, “Maybe not”, “At least not alone”, “I don’t know”, “Did you?” And so on, and on, and on. This list is merely an excerpt of the many many many words people say when they talk about games and gaming. Words like “great”, “awesome”, “spectacular”, “kick-ass”, “brilliant”, “inspiring”, “masterpiece”, “masterful”, “simply amazing”, and so on and so forth, and so on and so forth. It is a tedious, seemingly endless, list. While most of these words and phrases are relevant to the stories, struggles, experiences, and emotions of games themselves, there are times when they are merely used to justify, promote, and validate. This is especially true when these words are used by those who rarely even play games. The use of these types of words is so common in the gaming media that they have become a running joke. People love to say that games are great or that they are great games. For example, someone at a game event might ask “What’s so great about Mass Effect?”, and just about everyone will say that it was a great game. Or someone at a game convention might ask “What’s so great about Chrono Trigger?”, and “It’s such a great game!” will be a common refrain. Or someone might say, “Oh, you’ve played Killzone? Isn’t that great?”. Or “You’ve played Street Fighter? Isn’t that awesome?”. Or “You’ve played Splatoon? That’s great!”. And so on and so forth. People who rarely play games, as noted earlier, really love this. They love the sentiment, especially when they are not being challenged on it. Often, they revel in the fact that they have no experience with a game so they can use these words as a means of validation.

The proposed training program of the Dartmouth Center on the Social and Ethical Issues in Mental Health Services is designed to train a new cadre of mental health care and social policy analysts with the appropriate training and research skills to serve as catalysts for policy change in mental health services in this country. The curriculum aims to develop a theoretical framework in which to understand, analyze and critique mental health policies, practices and programs in an environment of service delivery, financing, quality assurance, rights, consumer advocacy, and consumer protection. In addition, the curriculum provides training in the design, implementation and evaluation of complex social policy research studies in an ethical manner. The training program is comprised of a basic core curriculum that begins with a focus on social policy and the philosophy, theory and methods of qualitative and quantitative research in the social sciences; then, we build upon this foundation by providing a background in the philosophy, theory and methods of assessment and evaluation of mental health programs; and finally, we wrap up with a focus on mental health policy and service delivery. The trainees enter our program at the graduate student level, but are prepared at the postdoctoral level by the faculty of the Social Science Research Training program at the Dartmouth Institute for Health Policy and Clinical Practice. Training is carried out within the framework of the Department of Social Relations at Dartmouth, which is at the forefront of the study of social policy and mental health. Moreover, the diversity of the faculty and programs within the Department of Social Relations generates an exceptional environment for training in research, prevention, and policy relevant to mental health services. Marta Granollers Marta Granollers is a Spanish international footballer who plays for Levante UD as a forward.
