Unlike last time, I'm not going to get into the weeds about which of the major candidates "I" support. Of the Democratic candidates, Bernie Sanders, Hillary Clinton, and Martin O'Malley (who has lost his state primary already) have a combined majority of supporters of the "I" category, mostly because only Sanders has gotten in the race (though O'Malley has gotten in on the ground floor with a significant endorsement and a lot of support on social media). For the Republican side, Trump and Cruz have an "I" majority, while Rubio has a caucus majority (which he's lost already) and Fiorina is getting a large number of "I" votes. The No/Not Voting/Other group is still barely in the double digits. There's a slight chance that by the convention, the voters could opt to give a more motivated group of delegates more points toward the final percentage. But my big question is: will the candidates be able to spend so much money to get them
